As the COVID-19 pandemic continues to rage in hotspots throughout the country and around the globe, it's beginning to dawn on the working world that the "new normal" may mean continuing to work from home full-time, part-time, or on a flexible schedule.

Indeed, a recent survey found a 47% increase in productivity since workers have been stuck at home. Working from home can also save your employees and your company money. The cost of heating and cooling an unoccupied workspace is obviously much lower than maintaining the perfect climate for a building full of workers.

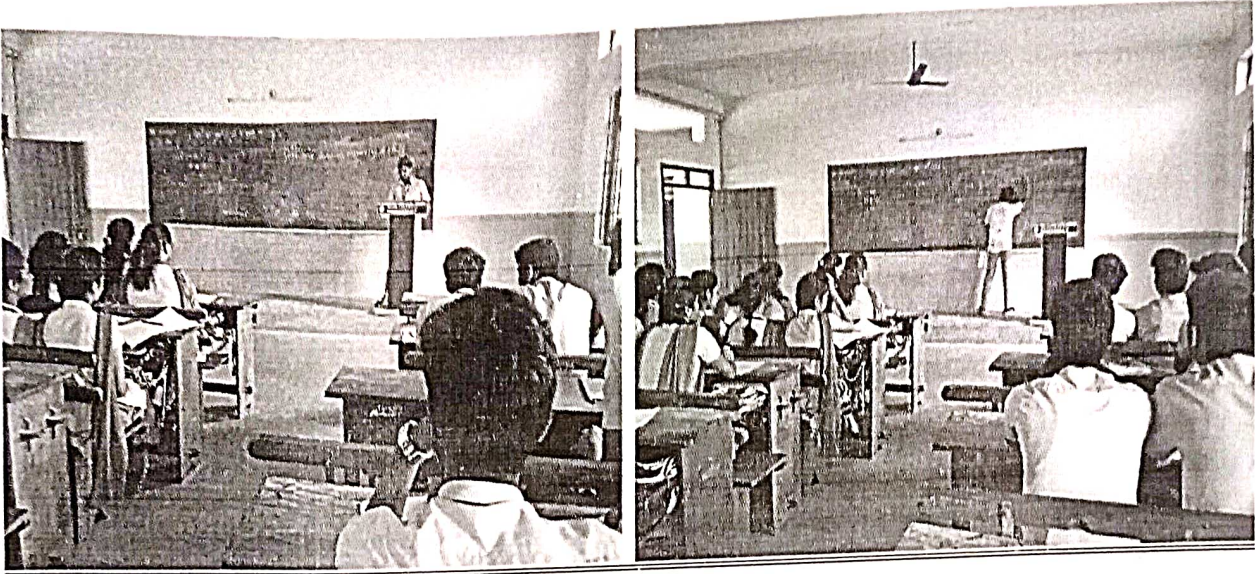

Many experts believe that there will now be a permanent shift to more working from home. This is because the experience of home working has demonstrated to businesses and their employees the range of benefits that it can bring. Working from home can allow people to work smarter and to achieve more with their time and resources, as well as achieve a better work-life balance. Staff can avoid the need for commuting and the stress associated with it, freeing up more time and energy to be invested in productive work. These factors can improve staff morale and lead to better staff retention and loyalty. There is certainly evidence building to prove the case that home working can enhance productivity.

On the other hand, working in an office can have important benefits too. The value of face to face communications and a sense of personal connection is enormous and this can be an important contributor to staff motivation. Simple things such as shared whiteboards can be surprisingly helpful. There is also the 'buzz' of the office, which is impossible to replicate in a virtual environment. Even random chats at the water cooler can spark ideas and identify new opportunities or solutions.
